

Long Term Report

The Inka pen has been a wonderful pen to carry around. As noted in my previous reports I carry it with me at all times. I have used it to sign in at registrations booths at the trail heads, sign important documents at work, let other people use it when they didn't have a pen, sign credit card receipts, take notes in my journal, take notes in a business meeting and countless other times when I just needed something to write with. I took it on several backpacking and hiking trips in the past two months. The temperatures ranged from 75 F (23 C) during the day to 30 F (-1 C) at night. At no time during my testing period did I find the temperature having any affect on the pen while I was writing. Several times on one of the trips, during the rain, I wrote in my journal as I was walking and the rain did not spear the ink on the water proof paper. This was nice because I knew that it really didn't matter how hard it was raining, I could still write in my journal and know that the ink wouldn't smear. I don't have anything different to write about since the Field report or at least nothing has changed about the pen. It still works great when I need it to write.
